Vice Principal's message

‘Your habits follow you from cradle to grave’ is a proverb proven time and again.

As in all else schools, by and large my classmates were entirely different in many means and ways, I could see the convergence of a spectrum of characteristics in them. The fact that amazes me today is that even today these characteristics of theirs remain the same even many years after they have grown up considerably in age and experience.

Many of those who had the required or more intelligence and interest in acquiring knowledge, were determined to face various challenges in life during their studies, later on, successfully overcame the ups and downs similarly in order to lead a responsible life.

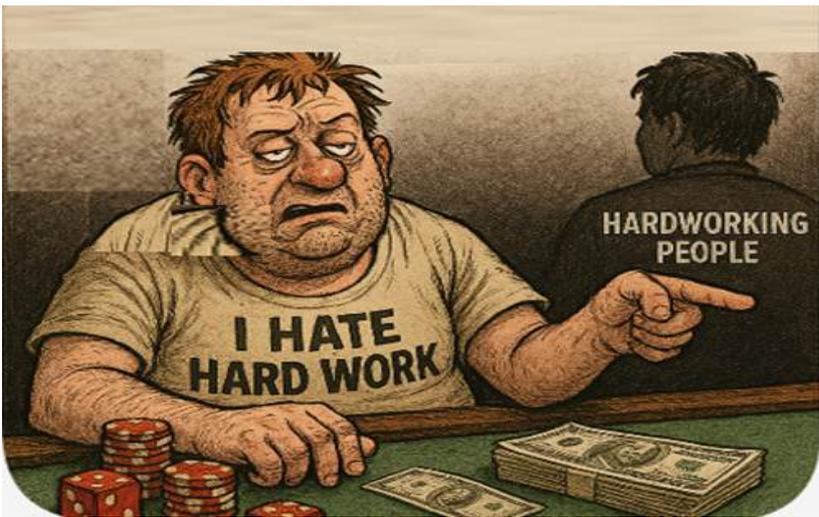

Among them those who believed that life has a purpose, whether or not they achieve financial stability, live happily and peacefully without deviating from the core values that they had acquired in their earlier life, and those who deviated, become manipulators of money and power that they are bestowed with, to make others' lives miserable.

Those who had intellectual power but lacked the desire to work hard (there could be many reasons for that), instead of using their latent talent to its fullest, they found every excuse not to use it, and moved on with their lives, enjoying the comforts provided to them by others.

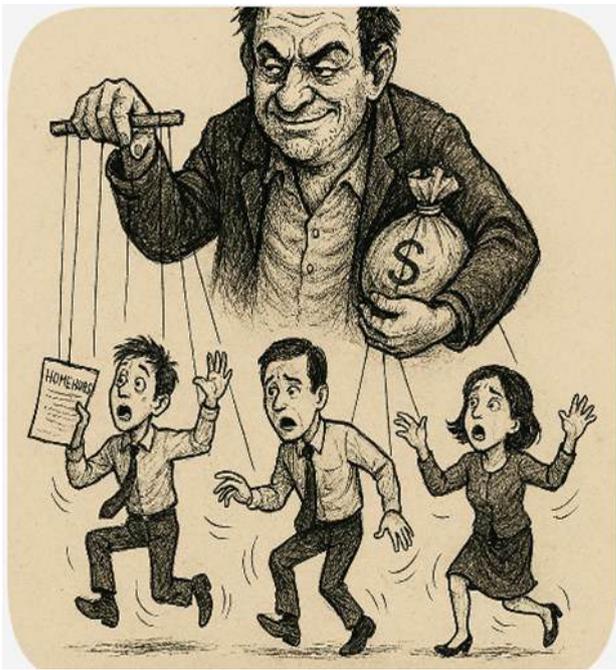

They were the ones who were accustomed to climbing trees only when being pushed by others. Even today, such persons fulfil the responsibilities entrusted to them only when they are forced by their wives, children, or others, otherwise they act as though they are worthless junk.

Then, those who leave everything to chance and act irrationally, sometimes receiving great gains and often suffering terrible losses. These people take credit for their minor achievements and blame those around them for their massive shortcomings. Not only is hard work in their vocabulary, but they also have a deep contempt for those who do work hard.

They find millions of lame excuses not to do the things they need to do just because they don't have an iota of willingness to do the right things.

Those who didn't even do their own homework and lived by relying on others for everything, considering irresponsibility a characteristic of their personality would borrow from anyone, but never pay it back. They are the real parasites. They have an impeccable knack to make others dance according to their tunes. They would never be contented, no matter how much they accumulate by hook or crook - the relentless manipulators who drain others while never feeling satisfied.

Those who fall victims to these manipulators, unfortunately will be forced to bear the responsibilities of the actions cunningly staged by the former behind the curtain.

Another fantastic group of people who sit on the back bench, make the atmosphere of the class fun-filled, work creatively in everything except studies and get along with everyone and live happily. Later, they do various kinds of business, perhaps achieve a relatively better financial position than those who meticulously studied and became high-ranking officials. They seem to have a wider circle of friends in all walks of life.

Another group of people who find themselves inferior, do hate everyone, have no self-respect and blame everyone else for their plight, as they live with vengeance against themselves personally and society as a whole. They want others to consider them superior, but because they know that others would never have that perception of them, they find pleasure in belittling and mocking any praiseworthy actions done by others. It is a tragic reality that the teachers are not given the authority or right to guide such students in the right direction during school.

There are those who built their career brick by brick through a combination of their own efforts and luck. They worked tirelessly with others in all school activities and continue to move forward even today, integrating with others in their family and society, often showcasing their leadership qualities in fields where others may fear to tread in.

If they receive a little encouragement from others as they expect, society can gain many benefits from them.

If you can identify your ward, in which among the above categories your ward belongs to, you can predict his / her future.
